

V. Land Clark

V. Land Clark is a professional football official who has served as a referee in the NFL since the 2020 NFL season. He wears uniform number 130 and resides in Albuquerque, New Mexico.

Early Career and Collegiate Officiating

Before joining the NFL, Clark spent several seasons in the NFL's Officiating Development program. He worked in the Pac-12 Conference as both a referee and a deep wing official. His experience at the collegiate level included officiating high-profile games such as the 2013 BCS National Championship Game and the 2015 Sugar Bowl, which was a College Football Playoff semifinal.

NFL Career Highlights

Clark was hired by the NFL as a field judge in 2018. Following the retirement of veteran official Walt Anderson, Clark was promoted to the position of referee—or "white hat"—at the start of the 2020 NFL season.

While he has not yet officiated a Super Bowl, Clark has been assigned to multiple postseason games, including a Wild Card round playoff game. Outside of football, he is a chief building official for the city of Albuquerque, N.M.
